

Robbyne Jones is an NMC Vice President. Her professional experience is in Human Resources, including strategic planning, learning and development, compliance, and ethics. She has worked at the executive level in multinational professional services firms for more years than she'd like to count, and as an independent consultant since 2010.

In addition to serving on the NMC-NMWA Board, Robbyne volunteers in the broader local community in areas related to literacy, women's health, and politics. She also serves on her community's HOA Board.

Robbyne says she has visited the National Museum of Women in the Arts in DC twice, and both times came away inspired by the talent and determination of the artists whose work hangs on their walls. "I became involved in the New Mexico Committee of NMWA because I am committed to equality for women," says Robbyne. "In my mind, the underrepresentation of women artists in museums is one more example of women's underrepresentation in so many areas of life, including government and the corporate world. Working to lift up women in the arts, especially in New Mexico where we are exposed to the work of so many talented women artists, is very fulfilling. "

Robbyne, her husband, Dan Klein, and Daisy, their Jack Russell Terrier (or Terrorist, depending on her mood), moved to Santa Fe from the Washington, DC suburb of McLean, Virginia, in May 2012. They are full time-residents of New Mexico, enjoying living in an area with "far less traffic and many more interesting people." Robbyne says they particularly appreciate being surrounded by culture - especially music and the arts—and the beauty it brings to everyday life.
